Editorial

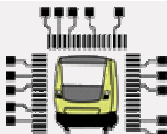

Clearsy took advantage of its attendance at the SIFER 2007 fair to announce the launch of its new FERSIL site.

This site is entirely dedicated to rail transport and describes Clearsy's expertise in the development of safety systems.

More news as well: the Linux version of Brama animations, the launch of the Brama tool and Version 1.6 of CompoSys.

We created too a new Forum specifically for tools.

Cleary Tools/Methods

Cleary designs engineering tools and, in particular, distributes Atelier B, B4free, Brama and CompoSys. Other tools are under development: In this newsletter, we provide more information on the Brama tool that is currently being developed.

Brama is available for downloading at no cost: a tool to assist in the graphic animation of B models realized in the context of the Rodin Project, this tool is distributed in Beta test format and works in an Eclipse environment. All B models developed with Rodin can be animated. You can also import models developed in Atelier B and CompoSys environments. Click here to download the tool: download Brama.

We look forward to receiving your feedback on the forum:

Brama demo animations are now compatible with WINDOWS XP, VISTA and LINUX.

Visit : Brama Animations

This animation was designed so that the animation interface is more intuitive and user-friendly. It is available on the Brama site: Terminus Animation

Online demos for each animation are also available on the site: Demonstrations...

Atelier B: available in a test version, Atelier B 3.7 was completed at the end of June 2007. It will be distributed in July.

B4free is available to the public on the new site: www.b4free.com
